1st EVER International CANSA Corporate Relay for Life

choice)
Businesses are invited to enter as many teams of 10 – 15 people as they would like, to:

- Celebrate survivors amongst family, friends and colleagues;
- Enjoy a valuable team-building event;
- Meet and mingle with several embassies and VIPs also participating;
- Network with other Gauteng businesses in the specially provided networking tent;
- Receive a comprehensive networking datapack on all participants for future reference;
- Partake in the official 80th birthday celebration of CANSA; and
- Receive a tax certificate for your CANSA contribution (if requested).

How it works: Team members take turns to walk or run around a track (of about 1km) for 14 hours – cancer never sleeps and neither can they. One member of the team must be on the track at all times. There will be plenty of entertainment for those who aren't walking – camping out, live entertainment, good food (though you are welcome to bring your own), networking and community camaraderie.

Join the 1st ever International CANSA Corporate Relay for Life, and ensure your team has fun while they are making a contribution to the fight against cancer.
When: Saturday(3 September) to Sunday(4 September)
Where: Sports grounds (Denel Properties), Irene Campus, Centurion
Cost: R1500 – R2500 per team (depending on stand

SA Primary Education at Risk

Transparency International has recently published a report of a survey conducted in primary schools in Mpumalanga, Gauteng and the North West Provinces respectively. The research findings reveal a number of concerns regarding the state of governance and management in schools and districts across these provinces. Poor management and a lack of transparency are damaging the delivery of primary education in South Africa, according to a new report from Transparency International, the anti-corruption organisation. The report shows that one quarter of the schools in the districts surveyed were considered to be at high risk of corruption. "The government needs to strengthen governance controls both at the provincial- and school level and ensure that education budgets are used correctly," said Letshego Mokeki, National Programme Coordinator for Transparency in Service Delivery in Africa (TISDA). "The government has a duty to provide quality education for the next generation of South Africans, which is why it must take immediate steps to fight corruption." During the study, Transparency International surveyed more than 1,500 education administrators, head teachers, teachers, parents and heads of teacher-parent associations to identify the main governance challenges in delivering quality primary education.

- One out of three principals believes that the highest risk of corruption is related to the embezzlement of funds at the provincial level, e.g. when procuring textbooks, remunerating staff and constructing school buildings.
- Staff absenteeism, sexual harassment of learners and misuse of school funds are considered high corruption risks with one out of four learners indicating that the schools are unsafe and rape and violence are major problems.
- Three out of four principals estimate that they don't have the means required to run the schools, and one out of two students is not always provided with a desk. About 15% of schools had no electricity and 10% no water supply.
- The survey showed poor implementation and enforcement of rules and regulations. Only half of the educators interviewed believed that rules relating to school fees and fee exemption are respected. Extracts retrieved from Reports supplied by Transparency International
