Final draft of controversial bill adopted

The Protection of Information Bill is a step closer to becoming law. On Monday MPs adopted the final draft – despite opposition objections and threats of legal challenge. The ANC prevailed in the final vote on the contentious state secrecy bill with a comfortable majority, as it had on Friday in clause by clause deliberations.

After the vote, Steve Swart, from the African Christian Democratic Party, reiterated it would petition President Jacob Zuma to refer the bill for constitutional review. Swart said this was due to, despite endless petitioning, that the final draft lacked a public interest defence to protect people who published classified information to expose state wrongdoing.

The ACDP could find support from the Democratic Alliance. DA MP David Maynier said his party would take legal advice on whether the bill would pass constitutional muster without such a defence. Last week civil society organisations threatened to launch a Constitutional Court challenge if the president signed it without amendments to protect the press and whistleblowers.

However, Cecil Burgess, the ANC chairperson of the ad hoc drafting committee, told MPs he was satisfied that a sound piece of legislation had been delivered. Burgess said the bill would be tabled in the National Assembly before the legislature rose in late September. It would be several months at least before the bill went onto the statute books.

The bill criminalises the possession and disclosure of classified information and prescribes sanctions ranging from a fine to 25 years in prison.
