Miners sue Anglo American

Daniel Seabata Thakamakau, Dan Mafokeng, Richard Meeran (Picture by Duane Daws0)

London law firm Leigh Day & Co has begun proceedings in the London High Court against Anglo American South Africa, as the Johannesburg-registered wholly owned subsidiary of London-based Anglo American plc.

Lawyer Richard Meeran – who addressed a media conference in Johannesburg – says that the case is being brought on behalf of potentially thousands of former gold miners, who allege that they are suffering from silicosis and silicotuberculosis as a result of being exposed to dust in the company's South African gold mines.

One of those, Daniel Seabata Thakamakau, a retrenched former R1 200-a-month mine worker now suffering from silicosis, joined Meeran at the media conference and spoke through community leader and interpreter, Dan Mafokeng, about the dusty underground conditions that he had worked in without a face mask. He also spoke of his successful statutory silicosis claim last year, which resulted in him receiving a lump-sum compensation payout of R47 000. Although Anglo American no longer mines gold, it was the largest gold miner in South Africa for most of the twentieth century.

Leigh Day & Co says it has been working together with the legal resources centre on silicosis claims presently ongoing in the Johannesburg High Court on behalf of 18 former President Steyn gold miners, whose claims against Anglo American are supported by Legal Aid South Africa.

The company has now instituted legal proceedings in the UK High Court, which name more than 450 individual claimants and also include a claim for a representative class of unnamed underground black miners who are alleged to have contracted silicosis or silicotuberculosis as a result of dust levels in Anglo American mines up to 1998. The claim is potentially worth hundreds of millions of pounds, the law firm says.
