

Rising mining fatalities disconcerting – Solidarity

Trade union Solidarity on Monday, 6 March 2017, expressed its concern about the rise in fatalities in the mining industry in the first two months of 2017. This comes after the latest provisional statistics for the period 1 January 2017 until 27 February 2017 clearly indicated an increase in fatalities when compared with the same period in 2016.

transportation and general accidents, including employees being overcome by gas, are the biggest contributors to fatalities. "Apart from illegal mining, this poses a serious threat to the safety of employees in the mining industry," Mardon added.

"The drastic increase in fatalities during the first two months of 2017 is worrying and therefore Solidarity urges employers to focus on renewed efforts to prevent any further increase in fatalities in mines. Solidarity strongly believes in training and education of our members and for this reason we have developed a Health and Safety training course for shop stewards," Mardon said. According to Mardon, trade unions enjoy credibility among their members and therefore, they are in an excellent position to reach and motivate their members. "We are making a plea to employers to involve trade unions more often in their Health and Safety training decisions. It is also important that employers should become more supportive and involved with Health and Safety training by trade unions," Adv. Mardon concluded.
